

"Altruism is the worst quality in human beings"

Find truth in this statement, and dont give me any warnings, contradictions, 'be careful' , 'buts'

The truth it points toward is that self-sacrifice can become destructive when it is detached from wisdom.

Examples:

- A person who never says no eventually loses their own identity.
- Someone who lives only for the approval of others may call it kindness, while actually fearing rejection.

The statement is also attacking the idea that virtue signaling can masquerade as altruism.

Some people gain status by appearing generous.

“I helped.”

“I sacrificed.”

“I care more than everyone else.”

The act becomes about identity rather than genuine concern.

Another truth is that misplaced altruism rewards dysfunction.

If every consequence is removed...
someone who lies keeps lying.

someone irresponsible remains irresponsible.

someone manipulative learns manipulation works.

Helping without discernment can strengthen the very thing that should weaken.

*The statement also recognizes that humans possess obligations to themselves.

Building competence.

Developing character.

Learning.

Creating.

Maintaining health.

Protecting one's family.

These require investing in oneself. Endless self-denial can leave a person with little capacity to contribute anything meaningful.

There is also a psychological truth:

People sometimes use altruism to avoid confronting themselves.

It is easier to rescue another person than to fix one's own life.

Easier to volunteer than to confront insecurity.

Easier to solve everyone else's problems than to ask difficult questions about oneself.

In that sense, altruism can become an escape.

At another level, the statement suggests that respect often follows strength more than sacrifice.

Someone who is disciplined...

competent...

reliable...

and capable...

often contributes more to the world than someone who merely gives pieces of themselves away.

The most enduring contribution usually comes from having something valuable to offer in the first place.

The worst kind of altruism is the kind that abandons judgment, responsibility, and self-respect in the name of helping others.
